

Charlie and The Chocolate Factory

4AD Anson Hui (7)

Willy Wonka arranged a visit to his chocolate factory to find a child to inherit his business. He thought that grown-ups wouldn't listen to him and wouldn't learn anything. They would try to do things his own way, so Willy needed to have a child to be his inheritor.

Many people wanted to win the factory, but Charlie was the one who won it. There were five lucky children who could visit the factory. Except Charlie, all the other children had their own weakness. Many people wanted to steal the secret recipes of the factory, so Willy Wonka fired all his employees and closed the factory.

Charlie won the factory mainly because he had filial piety. Every day he chatted to his grandparents. Charlie liked eating chocolate, and on his birthday, he got a chocolate bar from his parents, but he didn't eat it. He shared it with all his family members. Another example is that when Charlie got the Golden Ticket, he suggested they could sell it to make their lives better.

In short, Charlie deserved to win the factory. He wasn't greedy, arrogant nor proud. Charlie's conscience and filial piety made him win the factory.
