

A Review of Charlie's Choice

5D Rebecca Lin

Charlie is a kind and compassionate young man. He loves music very much. Music is his life. This is the opening of the story. Then the build-up follows: there are two women falling in love with Charlie. One of the women is rich, and the other is poor. Next comes the problem --- Charlie has to choose between them. One of them is so rich that she has more than enough money to support his studies at the music school, but she doesn't like music. She doesn't play any musical instruments at all and she couldn't even sing in tune. In contrast, the poor woman is so musical, and her voice is like silver bells. The event of the story is that he goes to see his teacher and ask for advice. Then the resolution of the story comes: Charlie's teacher tells him to choose the one who he could not live without. The story ends with Charlie choosing the rich woman.

If I were the writer, I would add more to the opening. I would tell readers more about Charlie's love of music, and I would write more about his good qualities so as to show why the two women like Charlie at the same time. In the build-up of the story, I would write more about how the two women pursued him in different ways. Moreover, I would write about an argument between the two women. I would add more information about the characters so that readers understand their family background. I would also change the ending of the story. At first, Charlie wants to choose the poor woman, and then I would write about what the rich woman is doing to make Charlie change his mind. This will make the story more realistic.

I don't have any similar experience, but I always see something like that on TV. The story describes a common life experience in which we have to choose between interest and money. If I were Charlie, I would choose the poor woman because they have the same hobby, and they can enjoy being together. Although they are poor, they can make money together. It will be a good memory in their life.

To conclude, Charlie's choice is an outstanding story. I think that for most writers, they would let Charlie choose the poor woman because they are like-minded. However, in real life, other reasons such as money could change our relationship with others. So, this story is a realistic one.
