

My dream job

I have read so many articles about villagers growing up in poverty. Many of them are living in underprivileged countries where children have low to no education and have to work at a very young age. What makes it worse is that they have no money to afford medication, so many people die because of viruses, starvation or even work overload. This inspired me to work as a UNICEF volunteer to help the people in need.

I think the advantages definitely outweigh the disadvantages when it comes to this job. I love spending my free time around mountains and a peaceful neighborhood, far away from the city. Staying indoors and listening to the sounds of the waves gives me so much comfort and freeness. I feel like the best thing about being a UNICEF volunteer is the stories I'll hear from different people, the stories about their lifestyle, their background, the things that make them happy, proud or sad. The other best part of this job is the people I will be helping. Giving them food, water, medicine and seeing their faces brighten up as they receive something that they'll cherish forever. I love that it gives them the sense of hope and it builds such a strong bond.

And like everything else in the world, there are also disadvantages. I would say the only disadvantage is the low salary and the lack of free time with a very hectic environment. But I really love to help the underprivileged children and people to protect them from diseases and give them quality education.

I didn't have much work experience but every year on my birthday when I go back to my home country, my parents and I would donate clothes, stationery and toys for the children in the orphanage. I grew up spending a lot of time helping not only people but also animals, which has helped me become more confident with my dream job.

In conclusion, my dream job is to work as a UNICEF volunteer to rescue people from violence and exploitation and give them everything they need to survive and thrive.
