A Life-Threatening Incident

Another day, another job well done. That's what I say every day, but today is a little bit different. I almost lost my life. I never thought that preserving pandas could be this dangerous. If I were to get injured, I thought it would be caused by pandas attacking me or tall bamboos falling on to me. But that was far from the truth.

I woke up on the hard wooden bed made from sticks. I prepared my gear and made my breakfast before dawn. After that, I set off to the mountains.

And as usual I found a few infrared camera traps. Then I stopped a few poachers from hunting. Along the way I found something strange. Under a tree stump I found some eggs. I didn't think much of it since the eggs were bruised and rotten. So I went to check on the pandas. And they looked like they were having so much fun.

After a long day of work, night fell and I set up camp at the Najiing river. I wrapped up my dinner, midnight arrived.

Before going to bed I heard a small hissing sound, but I was so exhausted that I went to sleep anyway. I woke up in the middle of the night because I felt something touching my legs. And when I checked to see what it was, my face turned pale. I screamed at the top of my lungs as I stared into its soulless frightening eyes. I had come face to face with a snake! But this type of snake is deadly poisonous. When I screamed, it bit down on me with all its might. I ran immediately back to the campsite to find the antidote. I was feeling light-headed and was about to pass out at any moment. Luckily, I found it and as soon as I did, I applied it to the wound.

This was a very narrow escape from death. But it's worth it for the pandas. At least, I live another day protecting them. The government invests a lot of resources in protecting them from danger. It's important because if we don't protect them, they will go extinct.
