A Letter of Advice

Dear Winnie,

I'm so sorry you are feeling upset. I understand that you want to drop out of the school to pursue a career as a pop singer, but I can also understand your parents for not letting you. I'd like to give some of my opinions related to this issue.

Firstly, you should try thinking from your parents' point of view. They want you to be happy and successful in the future. They are worried that it might be a mistake and, in the reality, it is not easy to succeed in the show business. You really need to be lucky to stand out from the crowd and get popular. Don't envy what other people have.

Furthermore, I think you should stay in school and focus on your studies. Don't give up your studies. You need qualifications; if you are without a college degree, or a high school degree, it'll be much harder to be accepted in the show business. Many pop stars are well-educated with a university degree, such as Brno Mars. If you work hard towards your target, you will achieve it eventually. Wouldn't it be better to finish your DSE first?

To conclude, it is very important to help your parents understand your dream. Try stepping in their shoes. Show them that you are determined and will keep working hard to achieve your dream. Then, your parents will give you full support and trust that you'll pursue it and never give up. Communication is always important, so talk to your parents more. Isn't it too early to target becoming a pop singer as your future career? Try to find a common goal to slowly build yourself up to being a pop singer.

Best Wishes,

Chris Wong
